Pepper and Jack are high school students managing their families' social media accounts when a Twitter feud between their businesses spirals into a viral sensation. As they trade witty insults online, they unknowingly grow closer in real life through an anonymous chat app. Their rivalry turns into something more, but their family obligations complicate their budding relationship.

This book is a delightful rom-com filled with humor, heart, and social media antics. Emma Lord crafts a fun and engaging enemies-to-lovers romance that feels fresh and modern. Readers who enjoy witty banter, contemporary romance, and stories about navigating family expectations will love this book. If you liked the competitive dynamic and lighthearted romance, Today Tonight Tomorrow by Rachel Lynn Solomon is another great enemies-to-lovers read with snappy dialogue and heartfelt moments.

While the romance is adorable, some plot points feel predictable, and the social media aspect may not appeal to everyone. However, even when it felt cliché, the story was like a comforting breath of fresh air—something familiar yet lovable. That familiarity is part of its charm, making it a solid 10/10 read. If you're looking for a lighthearted, feel-good read with plenty of humor, Tweet Cute is a great choice. You may also enjoy Made in Korea by Sarah Suk, which has a similar business rivalry backdrop mixed with romance.
