Color Me In follows Nevaeh who is a biracial teen struggling to find her identity after moving in with her mother's Black family in Harlem. She is coming from a rich and mostly white suburb. She feels out of place and pressured to define herself while dealing with family issues, finding friends, and her own self-discovery. Color me in explores some important topics such as race, religion, privilege, and identity. Nevaeh and her journey to find who she really is compelling and relatable. This book is very relatable and captures the the life of teens very well.

I would recommend Color me in to people who enjoy contemporary and YA novels. Most teens can relate to this novel and its meaningful themes and the topics it explore make it easy to connect with while learning and seeing new perspectives.
