Two years after losing his mother to cancer, a highschooler by the name of Jamison Deever had fallen into a shock of grief, while being scared that the memories with his mother would start fading away. So in order to not let the memories of his mother legacy fade away, Jamison has made a commitment with his love of photography to take a photograph of a passing stranger every single night at 9:09 PM, this was the time of his mother's passing. This would start off as a private routine till it becomes a way for Jamison to cope and then finally be able to re-enter the world.

The 9:09 Project is an absolute well thought novel in realistic young adult fiction with its capturing the heaviness and the nature of grief it does to someone. Mark H. Parsons delicately uses a needle and thread to piece together such a tender story with a supportive yet, fractured family learning how to bond with each other once again. The dialogue perfectly embodies the mind of a teenager, sharp sometimes, then sometimes vulnerable when times gets tough. This book shows a artistic view as Parsons incorporates epigraph at the beginning of each chapter.
